Q.5 CASE STUDY: Keerthy meets Murugan through Shaadi.com

“I didn’t want to fall into the traps of a typical Indian arranged marriage; I believe it doesn’t give you the required time and opportunity to know and understand your would-be partner, especially with families breathing down your necks while calling for a decision,” said Keerthy. “And I always wanted to choose my partner myself,” concurred Murugan, adding, “That’s why Shaadi. Com worked for both of us. ” Keerthy and Murugan are among the 48% of Internet users who surf matrimonial sites for alliances.

While traditionally the activity of matchmaking was left to the elderly aunts of the family, marriage bureaus, and newspaper matrimonials, with the advent of Internet and a change in youngsters’ preferences, online alliance search has taken off with frenzy, especially with 60% of the online population in India being below the age of 25. With 12 million urban Indians undertaking online matchmaking, it is the 13th most popular online activity among Indian surfers. Although online dating is ahead of matrimonial searches as the 10th most popular online activity, it does not enjoy the high user loyalty and brand premium of matrimonial websites. This is because Indian culture has yet not fully accepted the concept of dating before marriage and people do not register on a dating site for finding a life partner. There is also a huge overlap between the two activities suggesting that people who date are also looking for a mate. Owing to a close-knit social structure of India, families and friends still have an important role to play in online matchmaking. Often parents are seen posting their children’s profiles, and while the final choice may be the children’s, parents extensively carry out activities like gathering information, filtering profiles, matching horoscopes, etc.

Advertising seems to be harping on factors like wide profile choices, relevant matches, and a joint selection process that satisfies the entire family. Smaller portals such as Simplymarry.com have also adopted viral tactics such as creating a website, rather a catchy micro site.

One such communication triggered the dormant desire of finding a life partner for Murugan. While watching the film ‘Metro’, Murugan was exposed to Shaadi.com. The movie depicted Konkana Sen Sharma and Irrfan Khan getting older and feeling the need to find a life partner, and then turning to Shaadi.com for help.

Murugan believed that the biggest advantage of online matrimonial sites was their massive database, which offered people a wide choice of matches across both objective and subjective evaluation criteria such as education and career, religion, family background, location, personal preferences, personality, etc.

Keerthy had chosen Shaadi.com as she was particularly impressed with its strict profile screening system, and the simplified search technology that increased the relevance of the matches. She also appreciated the portal's attention to details through features like password-protected photographs that allowed members to maintain secrecy.

The study by the reputed agency marked Shaadi.com as the leader with 9,87,000 unique visitors in July' 07. Convinced of Shaadi.com's effectiveness after a month-long free registration, Keerthy and Murugan had signed up a 6-month premium membership. When they found each other and finally decided to marry in a year, they posted their success story like many others who had also found the right partners through Shaadi.com.
