"A concept, like a fact, is an abstraction, not a phenomenon. It takes its meaning from the thought framework within which it is framed. The distinction between fact and concept is that concepts symbolize the empirical relationships and phenomena which are stated by the fact. Thus ... a fact is stated as a relationship between concepts, for each term stands for the phenomena described by the fact. In this sense, then, a fact is a 'logical construct of concepts.' A concept, in turn, is abstracted from many sense impressions, or concepts. The process of conceptualization is one of abstracting and generalizing sense impressions. In this way, it is possible to manipulate, study, organize, and isolate the properties of objects. It is only by thought that such properties can be isolated, and thinking can proceed only by giving names to such properties. Thus conceptualization is essential to thought."
