- a) The above lines are taken from the poem, 'Snake' written by D. H. Lawrence.
- b) The act of hurling the wooden log at the snake by the poet is being referred to.
- c) The snake was harmless and saved as a guest at the poet's water trough. It is described as a man act because the poet tried to hurt the snake and forced it to retreat into the black hole by heeding to the voice of his accented human education.
- d) An allusion is made to the albatross because it was a Christian soul symbolising innocence but was killed by the ancient mariners. Similarly, the poet tried to harm the snake and then went through a phase of guilt and regret as the mariners had faced redemption.

a) Lavinia, the wife of John Hallock had organised a Quiza board party. A woman named Helen was trying to communicate with John through all the boards. This created a suspicion in Lavinia that her husband had an affair and the thought was accentuated by the manipulators and Lavinia thinks who added that John looked extremely suspicious that John was a cheat, she decided to leave her husband and go to her grandmother.

b) Michael Dawson peered over the shoulder of a lady and read the headline of the miraculous recovery of a 14 year old boy named Sebastian Shultz, which seemed familiar to him. Further when he caught a glimpse of the picture he recognised him as the boy whom he had come to know very well in the past few weeks. He went home and decided to get an explanation about how he had come to know a boy who was in a deep coma after an accident, by playing the psycho-drive games.

c) The sculpture of Ozymandias terribly failed in fulfilling its purpose. The arrogant king had ordered it to be built in his remembrance, celebrating forth his achievements. The words - 'My name is Ozymandias, King of Kings, Look upon my works ye mighty and despair' show that the emperor was egomaniac. But ironically the triumphless statue it sinks in the lone level sands extending to the horizon and none of his works remain. This proves that pride always has a fall and time is the most powerful ruler.

e) The coming of the albatross proved to be a boon to the mariners who were surrounded by ice all around. The Christian soul was considered angelic because the ice seemed to be an emerald broke with a deafening noise like the voice in a sword. The sailors rejoiced as the helmsman steered them through. The Albatross took the sailors to the shore of safety and always perched at vesper's mine to eat the food it had never eaten and play with the ancient mariners.

The poem, 'Not Marble, nor the gilded monuments' written by William Shakespeare revolves around the idea that the sonnet is eternal.

The tantalising line, 'tarnished the soft shimmer on the tombstone'. The poet emphasises that, 'wasteful wars will overtake the statues and scrolls will rot out the work of masonry but neither Mars, the god of war nor his malicious sword will be able to leave the living record of the poet's friend.

None of the magnificent monuments shall outlive the powerful rhyme. According to the poet, against death and all oblivious enmity, the sonnet will remain until the day of judgement. He says, 'that the verses will always be remembered in the admiring eyes and thus immortalises literature.

The fact that the sonnet is still being read proves to be the evidence that it shall never be destroyed. The beauty of literature will always be savoured even though men will come and go from this world. It promises a hope to posterity that cannot outweigh the power of words that are best weapons available to mankind.

41. Margot Frank:

Margot is the sixteen year old daughter of Otto Frank and Edith Frank as well as the elder sister of Anne Frank. The family moves into the Secret Annex because she receives a call-up notice. She is a precocious girl who is level-headed, and happens to be the prettiest, wisest, kindest and the best in the eyes of Anne.

It is evident that she is mature enough as she is allowed to read a variety of books some of which Anne is denied. Mrs. Frank gives the same reason to Mrs. Van Daan when she is apprehensive of children reading adult books.

Margot is intelligent and mostly acquired 'A' grade in school. Nevertheless, she happens to be the one to take up the maximum number of correspondence courses and read a myriad of topics with a medley of languages in the Annex. Unlike Anne, she gets along with her mother very well which alienates Anne from her mother.

The discipline inculcated in her, catches one's mind where Anne says that she wouldn't even think of getting close to a boy renders, there is a talk about their engagement. She comes across as a funny, enthusiastic and humorous teenager when the sisters exchange funny notes among themselves about studying matters such as stussel sneering.

The sensibility in Margot comes to light when she writes letters to Anne about Peter. She is happy that Anne has found a friend to confide in, doesn't feel delicious that she's left out and adds on that she has developed a brotherly affection for Peter.

She has a smidgen appetite as is described as a poor eater. Mr. Van Daan rebukes that she is on a diet but Margot pays no ear to that. This shows that she's firm in her decisions and doesn't care much about the opinions of others.

The flange of sisterly love plays in when they grow to be more mature than other girls of their age and allow each other to read snippets of their diaries. She is sometimes mean to Anne when she calls her a figure in an 'indecent nighty'.

But, on a whole, she is presented as an ideal role model with a mélange of values and ethics in 'The Diary of a Young Girl'.

"A DREAM COMES TRUE"

- By Putzel Rode

I got admission to Class IX in an English medium school. I was very nervous as I was attending my new school for the first time. I had spent the midnight oil and worked my tail off communicating the right accent of British English. The day was finally here. The shrill trumpet of the Chariclean drove the mundane routine of lounging in bed!

I dressed up elegantly and set off to school. The orb of sun behind the enormous building cast forth a beautiful glow on the vestibule. The excited chatter diminished when the bell rang. The teacher entered and introduced herself as Ms. Tina and ~~the~~ it was followed by each one of ^{us} introducing ourselves. I was well prepared but my classmate figured out my origin and snobbishly frowned, when I spoke.

We were told that the student elections would be held in two days to elect the SPL - Student pupil leader. The din of exuberant voices told me that this was one of the most awaited events. I plodded back home and ~~at~~ narrated it to my inquisitive mother. Her eyes twinkled with encouragement and ^{she} called up the school to nominate me for the elections.

Imagine how I felt! I would be thrown stupefying looks after being a loser again. I reminisced the lovely days of my middle school. The hazy of playing and pranking brought a smile on my face. I suddenly remembered my dramatic teachers who had presented a book on eloquence.

At the drop of a hat, I survived to my cupboard and sat at my table. I picked the mesmerising quotes and wrote down a beautiful speech. I chose a snazzy symbol that came to my help - The dreamcatcher!!

The next day, students gave their monotonous speeches and before long it was my turn. I went on stage... Nerva had I been in limelight. A bead of perspiration trickled down my forehead. I closed my eyes, took a deep breath and made my promise! The audience gasped at this sudden surprise. The overjoyed cronies stood up and hoisted for me. The polling followed and I had butterflies in my stomach!

The Principal came on stage. There was deafening silence. My heart sank to a deep abyss. She held the badge in her hand. The speakers rang with my name. I had never imagined that my wildest dream would come true. Yes, I served as one of the best leaders the school had witnessed.
